The Rights of the State.

The State, in granting license to marry, has a right to know the object of the union, just as she requires a declaration from would-be corporations as to their purpose and scope. The marriage of two human beings, with the powers which God confers for good or evil, is of vastly more interest and concern to the State than the operation of its corporate wealth. No marriage is complete without the vital spiritual element; none should be privileged to wed who are not willing to meet all the requirements of that sacred relation.—Madame, Editorial.

The article begins with the earliest days of this state, describes vividly the lawless days of '49, when two gold fever attracted desperate fortune hunters from every quarter of the continent, and concludes with a recount of the amazing resources, vegetable and mineral, still hidden in this one of the richest garden spots of the wide world.
